

General Motors

Technical service information licensing is the process by which General Motors will make available the right to use the intellectual properties we have developed to service and repair our vehicles. These licensing rights are available to responsible companies in the aftermarket for a specified amount and for a defined period of time.

The primary type of technical service information and data licensed by GM is the proprietary knowledge we have developed for use by GM dealer service technicians to maintain and repair our vehicles.

Most of this information has been produced in print, photographic, video, and audio formats, but increasingly, this material will be provided in high-tech electronic formats including floppy diskettes, CD-ROMS, magnetic tape, internet and other user-friendly mediums. All of these products contain the statement, "Data and Software: Service and Parts Operations, General Motors Corporation. All Rights Reserved."

The relationship we maintain with our licensees is very important. Licensees pay for the right to use GM's intellectual property. Licensees are required to add, "Portions of materials contained herein have been reprinted with permission of General Motors Corporation, Service and Parts Operations" under License Agreement #XXXXXX" in the forward section of their products. Those who are not licensees and who use, copy, or distribute this information will be subject to legal sanctions and remedies.

For this reason GM will: 1) vigorously enforce copyright protection, and if necessary litigate against infringers, 2) follow up on reports of infringement received from licensees and others concerned about the integrity of GM information, 3) notify infringers of their legal obligations with respect to licensing, and 4) educate potential users of materials about their legal obligations with respect to licensing.
