SMU law professor gets probation for running down bicyclist who blocked way

Jane Dolkert, a well-known Dallas lesbian and tenured Southern Methodist University law professor, was sentenced by a Dallas County jury on Wednesday to five years of probation and two years of community service. The same jury on Tuesday had found Dolkert guilty of aggravated assault after they determined that she used her car as a deadly weapon when she intentionally struck a bicyclist riding at White Rock Lake.

Dolkert, driving her Volkswagen Passat, struck bicyclist Tommy Thomas, knocking him under the car and dragging him for several feet. Dolkert told a police officer investigating the incident that she had merely "tapped" Thomas' bicycle as he blocked her way, and that the incident escalated because Thomas slowed suddenly.

In addition to thanking him for his consistent presence in the struggle for GLBT equality, speakers poked fun of Hill's long career as an advocate for adultoriented businesses and prisoners' rights.

Joining Parker on the dais in skewering Hill were Houston City Council candidate Sue Lovell, attorneys Doug Caddy and Jim Skelton and TXT Newsmagazine managing editor Nancy Ford.

Pride interfaith service to include readings from Quran and address by Rev. Shockley

With its theme, "Created good — nothing more, nothing less," the Houston GLBT Pride Interfaith Worship Service, scheduled at 7 p.m. Sunday, will include the liturgy and music of numerous faiths, including Christians, Jews, Muslims, Buddhists and Hindus.

Coordinators said that the program will also include readings by the Islamic poet Rumi and selected verses from the Quran, recited by Hassan Zaidi, founder of the Houston Chapter of the AL-Fatiha Foundation, a group dedicated to the Muslim GLBT community.

The Rev. Madison T. Shockley II, pastor of Pilgrim United Church of Christ in Carlsbad, Calif., will deliver the keynote address, titled "What's Love Got To Do With It?"

GLBT chamber gets busy with Empower business exposition

By Lorinda Robb Contributing Writer

Trying to draw Houston's GLBT community to a business exposition can be like trying to scoop all of the minnows from Lake Houston with a teacup strainer.

But for Coy Tow, the challenge of pulling off such an event in the current political climate is important to everyone, gay and straight.

"This convention is the vehicle that lets us get face-to-face with corporations who want to get our business," he said.

Tow is the executive director of the Greater Houston GLBT Chamber of Commerce, a 10-year-old organization that promotes business and cultural development in and around the Houston area. For Tow, who counts himself among the chamber's founders, that means scoping out new members to find out where they stand on workplace issues for their GLBT employees.

"Our members are very much in line with GLBT community issues like partners benefits and non-discrimination workplace policies," Tow said. "It's not just a matter of, 'I want to do business with GLBT's."

Tow cites the recent attempted boycott by the American Family Association of Ford Motor Company over the carmaker's inclusive workplace policies and expenditures in support of gay events. The association - a rightwing religious group that just ended a boycott of the Walt Disney Company temporarily suspended its boycott earlier. this month after Ford acknowledged receiving feedback from some of its concerned dealers.

But Ford also publicly reaffirmed its anti-discrimination policies.

"These are people who put their money where their mouth is," Tow said of the automotive giant.

The exposition - tagged "Empower" - is reaching out in another way this year. For the first time, advertising dollars are being spent in the Houston Chronicle, the city's only daily newspaper. While the effectiveness of advertising in the straight market can't be measured yet, "It's another step forward," Tow said.

Not all of the group's sponsors are big names like Deloitte & Touche, Prudential Financial and Frito-Lay. AIDS Foundation Houston is one of 29 nonprofit groups on the chamber's roster of members.

Anissa Hill, the foundation's development coordinator, said she hopes that the expo will present nonprofit groups with an opportunity to reach a big audience.

"Our funding has gone so awry that we don't have the money that we did for outreach and other programs," she said. "But it's great to have an umbrella like this for these agencies and corporations to come together."

For Tow, providing help in ongoing struggles like the AIDS epidemic and equal rights for the GLBT community are a big part of the chamber's purpose.

"We're all consumers first," he said. "We make buying decisions every day. The only way we're going to achieve equal rights is to have loyalty to ourselves and our supporters."

The event will also feature a series of speakers on issues like aging, legal, religious and political activism. Performers - including contemporaryspiritual singer Christian Andréason and alternative singer-songwriter Sarah Golden - will provide music throughout the weekend.

Empower is scheduled June 18-19 at Exhibit Hall B of the George R. Brown Convention Center, 1001 Avenida de las Americas.

Center for AIDS accepting applications for Project LEAP 2005; 35 to be enrolled

HIV-positive people who want to get involved in the HIV grant allocation process are invited to apply for Project LEAP 2005, said representatives from Center for AIDS.

Project LEAP — an acronym for Learning, Empowerment, Advocacy, and Participation — is rated by people living with AIDS as one of the most comprehensive advocacy training programs for HIV-positive individuals in the nation. It provides graduates with the knowledge and opportunities to get involved in the community and to serve on the Ryan White Planning Council, coordinators said.

The free training program is scheduled each Wednesday for 17 weeks, beginning July 6 at the Center for AIDS, located at 1407 Hawthorne St. Attendance at all sessions is required.

Only 35 people will be enrolled. To apply, contact Bernie Vázquez at 713-527-8219 or Bernie@centerforaids.org, Applications are also accepted online at Centerforaids.org/leapapp.pdf.

Veteran activists gear up for Saturday's Futures Conference at Empower Saturday's presentation includes a 49-page document of resolutions that paint broad strokes for the community's hopes and plans for concerns such as the legal treatment of GLBT families, elderly care, youth and political goals.

The conference has its historical roots in Town Hall Meeting I in June 1978. A group of activists and their supporters met at the Astro Arena in response to a yearlong battle begun by Anita Bryant's nationwide tirade against homosexuals.

The 1978 meeting bore fruit with the formation of long-standing organizations like the Gay & Lesbian Switchboard, Gay Hispanic Caucus, Montrose Clinic and Montrose Softball League, coordinators said.

Longtime community activist Ray Hill, one of the founders of the original meeting and also one of three main coordinators of Saturday's event, said that the conference's purpose is to give birth to upcoming needs and prepare a battle plan for the future of existing organizations.

"We're now dying of and dealing with things other than AIDS," Hill said of the aging community. "There's breast cancer and physical mobility combined with other concerns."

Hill also said that the community owes lesbians a great debt of gratitude for all that they have done during the AIDS crisis.

The conference, hosted by the Greater Houston GLBT Chamber of Commerce, will be Hill's swan song as he steps away from gay activism, he said.

"The Ray Hill that began in the 1960s and raised all hell in your face isn't needed anymore," Hill said. He added that he believes that all of the resolutions proposed on Saturday will be passed.

Hill said he intends to concentrate his efforts on working for reforms in the Texas prison system.

The conference's document of resolutions was compiled after the input of volunteers during the preceding months by attorney and veteran transgender activist Phyllis Randolph

Frye. She said that the finished work will be made available to conference attendees.

"This is now the gay agenda, and it's extremely important," she said. "Frequently, the Christianites point hatefully to some mysterious agenda in a derisive tone."

Montrose Counseling Center is one of the groups born of the 1978 meeting. Sally Huffer, the clinic's community projects specialist, wrote or co-wrote eight of the resolutions regarding inclusion of bisexuals, safe schools for youth and care for the homeless.

"Just one youth concern is that queer youth are getting kicked out in the streets with no place to go," she said.

Among her other concerns are removing the stigma associated with those who have mental health problems, she said.

Huffer said her hopes for the event's outcome are simple. "We need to get together again to find unity and community," she said.

"It will work best with the more voices we have."

But Frye said that she knows exactly what will happen during the conference. "We can now say, 'You want a gay agenda? Well, here it is. What's your problem?"

The Conference for the Futures of LGB-TIQA Residents of the Houston Metropolitan Area will be held on Saturday from 3 p.m. to 6 p.m., upstairs from Exhibit Hall B at the George R. Brown Convention Center, 1001 Avenida de las Americas. The entrance fee is $10. Lesbian wins San Antonio council seat

Guajardo beats Suniga by 54.8% margin, becomes Alamo City's first 'out' council member

By Dennis Vercher

Elena Guajardo made political history last week when she became the first out-of-thecloset lesbian or gay man ever elected to the San Antonio City Council.

The 52-year-old retired Southwestern Bell Telephone Company engineer won nearly 55 percent of the 16,250 votes cast in last Tuesday's runoff election. She defeated Noel

A. Suniga, an immigration attorney, to claim the District 7 council seat. The incumbent, Julián Castro, vacated the seat after serving two terms in order to run for mayor.

Guajardo said she was excited about her victory and the coming opportunity to serve.

"What makes me excited is the makeup of the new council," Guajardo told the San Antonio Current. "We have such a potential to serve, and for me to be a part of that team is amazing for me."

Guajardo had emerged from the primary last month as the top vote-getter in District 7, a large but relatively compact area in north-

Association of Social Workers, Tejano Democrats and Stonewall Democrats, along with several other groups.

Guajardo earned a bachelor's degree from the University of Texas at Austin and a master's degree from Our Lady of the Lake University, a 2,000-student private university in San Antonio.

Guajardo's race was also noteworthy for another reason — it featured the Gay and Lesbian Victory Fund's first-ever "independent expenditure campaign."

Since it was established in 1991, the Victory Fund has primarily gathered contributions from gays and lesbians around the country and contributed them to the campaigns of selected out-of-the-closet office-seekers on local, state and national levels.

But in Guajardo's race, the group created a political committee that operated independently of Guajardo's campaign. The committee spent $20,000 to get in touch with voters by telephone and mail in support of Guajardo, said Robin Brand, the Victory Fund's vice president of campaigns and elections.

Including Guajardo, the last three people elected to the council from District 7 have been Latino.

The San Antonio City Council includes a mayor and 10 council members. Each of the members is elected from single-member districts.

2005's HATCH Alternative Prom breaks previous attendance records

By Nancy Ford

Though competing for attendees with several other Priderelated events, the 2005 HATCH Alternative Prom for youth, held June 10, was a huge success, coordinators said.

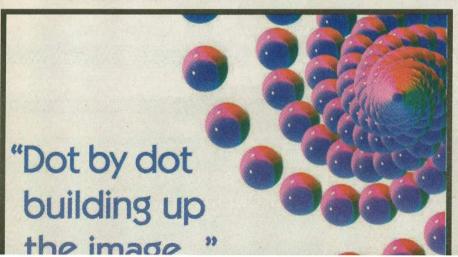

"We broke all the records," said HATCH youth services worker Deb Murphy. "We had to send out for more food."

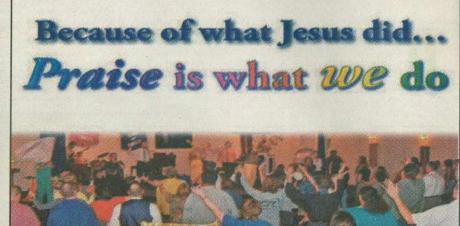

Sally Huffer of the Montrose Counseling Center, which sponsors the Houston Area Teen Coalition of Homosexuals, said: "It was the best prom we ever had. You could barely move."

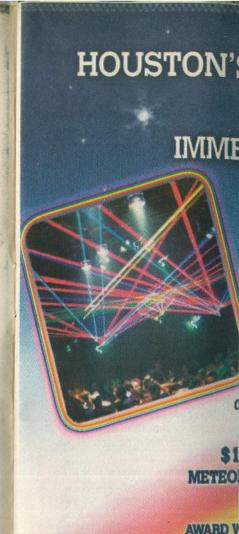

Now in its 12th year, the prom, held at the Historic Magnolia Ballroom in downtown Houston, was attended by nearly 300 people, more than half of of them youths, Murphy said. Adults attending included volunteers from more than 20 individual and corporate sponsors.

"We thank all the sponsors and volunteers who turned out to help us make sure this was a safe, sober and unforgettable experience for the youth," Huffer said.

Transsexual woman accuses San Antonio officer of rape

Police officer placed on administrative duty pending outcome of investigation

By Dennis Vercher

A San Antonio Police Department officer was placed on administrative duty last weekend pending an investigation into an alleged sexual assault of a 21-year-old male-to-female transsexual.

The woman said the alleged incident happened Friday night as she was walking home near Laredo and Zarzamora streets.

According to the woman, the police officer pulled up next to her and asked if she had any outstanding warrants. When the officer realized the woman had an outstanding traffic ticket, he told her, "You can go with me or go to jail," the woman claimed.

The woman got into the patrol car, saying she feared for her life. The officer drove to a secluded area off Zarzamora Street, the woman said.

The officer then told the woman to get out and perform a sex act, she said. The officer then allegedly hit the woman in the face.

"When he punched me in the face, that's when I knew if I don't do what he says, he's going to do really something bad to me," the police incident report quoted the woman as saying.

The woman said the officer forced her to undress and sexually assaulted her. Afterward, the woman said, the officer dropped her off at a nearby parking lot.

Last Thursday, the Ryan White Planning Council, a key player in Houston area AIDS policy, voted not to allow the combined sales of nutritional supplements and prescription drugs.

Leaders of some smaller agencies earlier this month expressed fears about the possible "Wal-Mart-ization" of HIV health care and problems of competing with large companies merging with each other to create a one-stop shopping environment.

The planning council makes an annual determination of the needs and priorities of people living with HIV in the Houston area. The information goes to the council's CEO, County Judge Robert Eckels, who each fall sends out grant applications to area agencies.

Competition for the grant money — this year 23 agencies will compete for just over $19 million — is stiff. Fred Walters, Jr., executive director of the Houston Buyers Club, a supplements supplier, said his agency will now be able to apply for Title I money without fear of a huge competitor.

"We love to work with bigger agencies.

but we would have been at the mercy of a monster." Walters said.

Walters also said that while input from all agencies is vital to the needs-assessment process, he thinks that people working for any HIV agency should be barred from the council and its committees.

The problem of case manager licensing and education remains a big issue. Charles Henley of Harris County's office of HIV services said regulations in the CARE Act call for case managers in Title I agencies to have a master's degree in an appropriate field and a state license.

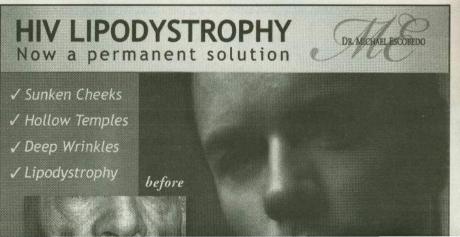

Terence O'Neill, executive director of Houston's Amigos Volunteers in Education and Service, said at last week's council meeting the question of case manager accreditation was sent back to committee for review.

He said his concerns over downplaying the role of service-linkage workers — case managers with experience but who lack a master's degree and license — still stand. "There is still a vacuum about decisions about a community-oriented plan for affected people," O'Neill said.

Agencies approved to receive Title I money get disbursements from March through the following February. In the year beginning in 2003, funding increased four percent from the previous year. In 2004, the area's agencies suffered a seven percent cut.

Adult video star granted parole

Dalton to be released after 3-month rehab program, will remain on supervision

By David Webb Staff Correspondent

The Texas Board of Pardons and Parole has paroled adult video star Mark Dalton, state officials announced.

Dalton will be released on supervision once he has completed a three-month rehabilitation program, said Mike Viesca, director of public information for the board. Dalton will remain on supervision until Nov. 1, 2009.

State law forbids making public the terms of Dalton's parole until he completes the rehabilitation program, Viesca added.

A two-member panel of the parole board made the decision on May 30.

Dalton, whose real name is Jeramy James Sons, was serving a five-year sentence at a prison near Palestine for possession of a controlled substance.

His latest video, Super Soaked, was released while he was in prison.

Jan Milstead, a former Dallasite who is director of production for Falcon Studios, said that Dalton's video has drawn widespread interest.

Prosecutors have not returned numerous messages left about the case.

State District Judge Carmen Rivera Worley revoked Dalton's probation last November on a 2001 conviction for possessing GHB. She made the decision after Dalton's former girlfriend testifed that he had assaulted her.

Dalton denied that he assaulted the woman and claimed that she filed the assault charge against him because she was angry over their breakup. The girlfriend has maintained in interviews that she was assaulted.

The assault charge against Dalton was dismissed after his probation was revoked. The girlfriend told prosecutors that she did not want to pursue the assault charges, but they continued to press for the probation revocation.

In addition to his conviction for possessing GHB, Dalton has several convictions for driving under the influence and failing to wear a seat belt.

Divided decision in case; New Jersey's Supreme Court to make final ruling

By Ann Rostow Senior Staff Writer

A New Jersey state appellate court finally weighed in on the Garden State's same-sex marriage case, issuing a ruling in favor of the state Tuesday.

The three-judge panel split 2-1, delivering three opinions: the 35-page majority opinion by Judge Stephen Skillman, a nine-page concurrence by Judge Anthony Parrilla and a 31-page dissent by Judge Donald G. Collester.

The case will be immediately appealed to the New Jersey Supreme Court, which will have the final word.

As was the case in Massachusetts, New Jersey's freedom-to-marry lawsuit was filed

NEW JERSEY in state court and involves only questions of state law. The decision of the state supreme court will be final, and may not be appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court.

David Buckel, the Marriage Project director at Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund, said lower court losses were "typical" in major civil rights cases, and the ruling brings the litigation one step closer to its final resolution. Nonetheless, the appellate loss is something of a departure from recent results in other states.

Although lower courts did indeed rule against same-sex couples in Vermont and Massachusetts, lately more of the early rounds have brought victories for the GLBT plaintiffs. In the last 10 months, for example, courts in Oregon, Washington, New York and California have ruled in favor of same-sex couples.

In Oregon, the state Supreme Court was obliged to retain the definition of marriage as a man-woman pairing thanks to the constitutional amendment passed by voters in November. The case in Washington was argued before the state Supreme Court last March, and a ruling is expected this year. As for New York and California, both those cases are headed for state appellate courts, but like New Jersey's litigation, they will eventually be decided by their respective supreme courts.

Although other same-sex marriage cases are underway, these four are the most advanced. New Jersey now falls into line behind Washington as one of the two states most likely to follow Massachusetts in equalizing marriage laws. For now, Massachusetts has a statute blocking couples from out of state from receiving marriage licenses, but presumably neither Washington nor New Jersey would bar nonresidents from marrying within their borders.

As for the opinions from the appellate court, Judge Skillman relied on familiar convoluted reasoning to determine that, because marriage is by definition a union of a man and a woman, gay couples are not being denied a fundamental right by being excluded. Judge Skillman cited two recent state appellate court rulings in support of his position, both involving rogue cases filed in Indiana and Arizona. Skillman and Judge Parrilla also construed marriage as a social infrastructure for the promotion of child-rearing.

"What Sarah Lael and her partner lack and seek may be summed up in the word dignity," wrote minority Judge Collester in reference to two of the plaintiffs. "But there is more they will gain from lawful marriage. That something else goes to the essence of marriage and is probably best left to poets rather than judges. It is the reason that people do get married. For marriage changes who you are. It gives stability, legal protection and recognition by fellow citizens. It provides a unique meaning to everyday life, for legally, personally and spiritually a married person is never really alone. Few would choose life differently."

Lesbian witch files federal suit against Michigan

Case could jeopardize future rulings affecting GLBT community and shows danger of 'rogue' suits

By Ann Rostow Senior Staff Writer

When a gay rights lawsuit catches the American Civil Liberties Union and the Lambda Legal Defense and Education Fund by surprise, it's generally not a good sign. Lawyers with serious civil rights strategies consult with the nation's experts in gay rights litigation. When court cases appear out of the blue, filed by individuals on their own initiative, the potential for bad rulings is magnified. The damage from anti-gay rulings, in turn, can increase exponentially as one conservative court leans on the previous court's opinion ike a crutch.

The phenomenon of rogue cases is bad mough when they break out in state courts. Federal suits are even worse. The GLBT legal community has only filed one federal mariage case, and that is a highly specific chalenge to Nebraska's anti-gay-marriage constitutional amendment. But last week, a woman amed Jessie Olson launched her own federal challenge to Michigan's constitutional amendment. Olson, 48, filed suit in U.S. District Court in Kalamazoo, using a complaint with large sections copied word-for-word from the 2003 Nebraska lawsuit.

Unfortunately, Olson overlooked the fact that Nebraska's amendment is phrased very differently from Michigan's. Among other distinctions, Nebraska's amendment singles out same-sex couples and specifically outlaws domestic partnerships, civil unions, and other legal ties between gay and lesbian couples. Michigan's constitutional amendment simply defines marriage as a union between a man and a woman.

Olson also ignored the fact that Nebraska's amendment was in force for three years before Lambda and the ACLU filed their lawsuit. By that time, the amendment had demonstrably kept gay men and lesbians from participating in the political process. In fact, a proposed bill that would have allowed survivors to make funeral arrangements for their partners had been pulled thanks to the amendment. By contrast, the Michigan amendment is only seven months old and has not yet affected the community's ability to lobby the Legislature.

There are many other passages in the plagiarized complaint that apply directly to Nebraska and do not make sense in the context of a case against Michigan. The most egregious is surely the cut-and-paste reference to two of the Nebraska plaintiffs, who are inadvertently presented as a typical Michigan same-sex couple.

Jessie Olson is also the plaintiff in the case, along with her partner, Tabitha A.

Olson is signed up for a number of local "meetup" groups, including the Grand Rapids

The phenomenon of rogue cases is bad enough when they break out in state courts.

vampires, the witches, the pagans, the "magickal" group, and the Wiccans. Olson describes herself as a "left-hand practitioner, with "more that 30 years of study & practice [and a] large collection of texts and grimoires." A "grimoire" is a magical workbook or book of spells. Olson signed up for all the groups on May 9 of this year, when she and Flatau also joined the "Michiana OUT GLBT Couples" meetup group.

Michigan's constitutional amendment, like its 17 cousins in other states, is nothing to sneeze at. Earlier this year, Attorney General Mike Cox wrote an opinion telling the city of Kalamazoo that a domestic partner plan that categorized people on the basis of sexual orientation would now be illegal. In response, the ACLU filed suit in state court to clarify the scope of the amendment. Nevertheless, a federal lawsuit - if bungled - risks creating a bad precedent that in this case could expand throughout the jurisdiction of the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit (Michigan, Ohio, Tennessee and Kentucky), influence other federal appellate courts, and maybe even wind up before the U.S. Supreme Court.

Any federal court opinion that allows states like Michigan to amend gays and lesbian out of their constitutions would clearly be a disaster for GLBT people, just as a ruling in favor of the ACLU and Lambda in Nebraska would be a powerful blow to the growing number of states with anti-gay-marriage amendments. That case won a lower court victory last month and is now heading to a showdown before the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit.

PHILADELPHIA — In a county where a courthouse plaque of the Ten Commandments led to a long battle in the federal courts, a new summer reading program is causing a controversy about the role of religion in secular life. Critics contend that Missing Heaven, the book chosen for the new Chester County reading program, has faith in God as a central theme. At least two groups have voiced concerns about the choice, and county commissioners - who first endorsed the selection — apologized, saying they had not read it and were not fully versed on the subject line.

Opposition to a one-book program selection is unusual but not unheard of, according to the American Library Association. Court novice wins permission to circulate petitions on West

SPOKANE, Wash. - A churchgoing single mom and unemployed florist has succeeded in getting a judge to approve a recall petition seeking the ouster of Spokane Mayor Jim West when others wouldn't touch the issue because of West's political clout.

A political novice, Shannon Sullivan on Monday argued her case without a lawyer — frequently apologizing to the court for her lack of legal acumen - and nevertheless succeeded in getting a judge to approve a recall petition.

In the process, Sullivan bested three lawyers hired to protect the mayor from fallout from a sex scandal that includes accusations of molestations of teenage boys nearly 30 years ago and accusations that he recently pursued Internet trysts with young men.

Visiting Benton County Superior Court Judge Craig J. Matheson threw out two recall charges — that West had used city computers to access a gay chat room on the Internet and had behaved in a way that hurt the city's repu-

Judge Matheson said that issue should be put before

"That, to my mind, is an improper use of the office," the judge said.

West has denied breaking any laws, although he acknowledged having relationships with adult males. He said late Monday he was conferring with his lawyers about whether to appeal the ruling that the recall can proceed to the signature-gathering phase.

The furor over West began in early May when The Spokesman-Review newspaper published allegations that West, a conservative Republican who consistently opposed gay rights legislation while in the state Legislature, sexually molested two boys nearly three decades ago when he was a sheriff's deputy and Boy Scouts leader. It also alleged that he visited Internet chat rooms for dates and sexually harassed a young man he recommended for a city job.

Sullivan filed recall documents on May 9, then filed again May 18 after a procedural error voided her initial work.

"I did it for my nine-year-old son and the youth of Spokane." Sullivan said. "I teach my son to respect authority. I don't think this mayor is a good role model."

Vermont, Virginia courts wrangle over jurisdiction in custody case

When civil union dissolved, Vermont court took charge; Virginia says action improper

By Ann Rostow Senior Staff Writer

The most widely watched lesbian custody case continues in Virginia and Vermont, where two women have found themselves in a battle of state versus state.

Last week, Gay and Lesbian Advocates and Defenders filed a brief before the Vermont Supreme Court, asking the justices to rule against born-again Christian and former lesbian Lisa Miller-

Jenkins. Miller-Jenkins has asked the state's top court to throw out several family court rulings that recognize the parental rights of her former civil union partner, Janet Miller-Jenkins. Lisa is presently in contempt of court, having ignored the various orders of the Vermont judge.

To make a long story short, the two women met in Virginia in 1997, and traveled to Vermont in 2000 to obtain a civil union. Lisa became pregnant through artificial insemination, and their daughter was born in April, 2002. A few months later, they moved to Vermont so that their civil union and the accompanying family legal rights would be in force. But the following fall, the women broke up. Lisa took the baby back to Virginia, while Janet stayed in Vermont to dissolve their civil union. By doing so, the Vermont court took jurisdiction of the entire separation, including the matters of visitation and custody.

Although the women started out cooperating, they grew hostile, and Lisa asked a Virginia court to wrest jurisdiction away from Vermont, based on Virginia's "defense of marriage" laws. Last August, the Virginia court agreed, and the stage was set for a contest that may eventually pit the Vermont Supreme Court against the Virginia Supreme Court. If conflict were to continue between the two states, the only the U.S. Supreme Court could sort it out, making this dispute potentially historical. Still, there's a long road to travel before such a scenario evolves.

Spokane Mayor Jim West: born again, still gay

At the end of each of their daily online newsletters, Focus on the Family puts in a little quotation. A few weeks ago I was struck by their selection of a remark by Benjamin Franklin: "Where liberty is, there is my country."

The nerve! This from a group that tries relentlessly to cram America's exuberant social corpus into a corset of Victorian morals on abstinence, G-rated television, banal movies, prim cheerleaders, goody-twoshoes teenagers, bland books and alcohol-free Sunday socials. Not to mention the fact that Franklin himself was a Deist, like most of the founding fathers, believing that God created the universe and then had nothign further to do with it. Franklin even had his doubts about whether

Ann Rostow

Anyway, I ignored the hypocrisy until this week, when I encountered a citation from Judge Learned Hand, who said: "Liberty lies in the hearts of men and women; when it dies there, no constitution, no law, no court can save it."

Are these Focus on the Family people reading or thinking about their selected quotes? Do they imagine that they and their narrow-minded, judgmental, restrictive agenda represent standing up for "liberty?" Have they checked a dictionary lately? It makes me want to scream.

and move to San Francisco, "where your lifestyle is accepted."

Aside from the fact that San Francisco is not too crazy about alleged pedophilia, the city that knows how has also never been big on (proven) nutcase narcissistic sociopaths like our friend Mr. Mayor. West wrote the citizen a rambling, self-serving reply, filled with talk of seeing the light and finding the Lord.

"I've decided to fill the emptiness in my life that I was trying to fill through other means with a relationship with God," he wrote. Are you nauseated yet?. "I'm also leading the senior staff of the city of Spokane to new heights and demanding results on a fast track." Oh yeah, right, as we used to say in the '80s.

Among other things, West is accused of repeatedly sodomizing a 12-year-old boy about 25 years ago, and he is suspected of other molestations — all of which he denies. This year, he was caught soliciting teenage boys for dates and offering them internships at city hall — which he doesn't deny, although he says the internships were not offered in exchange for sexual favors. Certainly not.

He ignored calls for his resignation, initially posing as a heroic but tragically flawed gay man in the fashion of former New Jersey Governor Jim McGreevey. That hasn't worked, so it seems as if he has switched personas and is now trying the Sackcloth and Ashes strategy. Whatever he's doing, it's been going on too long for my taste, and it sounds like the powers that be in Spokane want him the hell out as well. Oh, and last Monday a judge approved a recall effort so Spokaners can start circulating petitions.

Meanwhile, in other (alleged) pedophilia news, what do you make of Michael Jackson?

"If you have a cat or a dog, for that matter, be careful where they urinate," advised fireman Masahito Oyabu. "Especially keep them away from electrical appliances and wires."

The kittens "quickly ran to safety," the wire service said.

Eyes on Wisconsin

Here's something. Democrats in Wisconsin threatened to take the Coalition for America's Families to court over false and misleading advertising that targeted Governor Jim Doyle. The television ads, which were eventually pulled for lack of funds, said that Doyle raised hunting and fishing fees "to give partners of gay state employees free health insurance." In fact, Doyle urged lawmakers to add partners to the state university insurance plan, but the GOP-led legislature declined. But had they agreed with Doyle, the benefits would not have been free and they would not have been paid for by fishing or hunting fees.

That reminds me that for two months I have avoided covering of big lawsuit against Wisconsin, filed by the ACLU, that seeks domestic partner benefits for state workers. At one point, the aforementioned Legislature decided that the Democratic attorney general, Peg Lautenschlager, could not be relied upon to defend properly the state's habit of discrimination, so they hired some right wing extremist legal group to represent the state! I can't remember how they managed to do that. Doesn't really sound kosher.

OK. I looked it up. A cohort of conservative lawmakers have convinced the Alliance Defense Fund to represent them for free, and to petition the court to let the legislature intervene in the defense. So, we'll see. At any rate, I apologize for avoiding this story, but I had too many lawsuits and too little time.

Before we leave Madison, you should keep an eye on the state Legislature and see if they advance the anti-gay constitutional amendment that passed last session. In Wisconsin, amendments have to pass two consecutive sessions in order to go before voters.

Czech it out

Oh. I forgot to include the news that the prime minister of the Czech Republic favors a registered partnership bill, and that the European Parliament voted to support a position paper that, among other things, urged the entire European Union to recognize legal same-sex marriages.

I got distracted from international news by the incident with the naughty kittens and the fax machine. Understandably so.

At the beginning of march organizing, watched Elizabeth Birch, then the preside of the Human Rights Campaign, get caug up in what escalated into a screaming argument with Kerry Lobel, then the executive director of National Gay & Lesbian Task Force. It gave me the first indication that I not want to be caught in the crossfire of major egos.

Franklin even had his doubts about whether

Jesus, whose philosophy he admired, was actually divine. As for that question, he wrote pragmatically to Ezra Stiles a month before his death: "I think it needless to busy myself with that now, when I expect soon an Opportunity of knowing the Truth with less Trouble."

Pug pride

Did you go to Austin Pride? I saw some of you, and thank you all for saying hi. Did you see my pug, Pando? There were so many gay and lesbian pug owners that I believe we can start our own club, a subset of the regular Austin pug club, (otherwise known as Heart of Texas Pugs, or HOT Pugs). Our pugs will dress in rainbow halters and learn to perform line dances, while their mistresses and masters sip exotic cocktails from under the shade of the Tiki bar and toss them little pieces of Pupperoni sticks.

Go east, young men

Well, a girl can dream. Speaking of dreaming, Spokane Mayor Jim West is getting more bizarre by the week. This time, we've got our hands on an e-mail that he sent to a citizen who had urged him to pack up

I didn't follow the case, but I read in the paper today that the mother of Jackson's accuser insisted the singer was trying to kidnap her in a hot air balloon, and subsequently wagged her finger at the jury box in an obnoxious manner. Take this, bitch. Not guilty! I also read that Jackson has decided not to allow any more young boys to share his bed in order to avoid future misunderstandings. Now, there's a sensible plan.

Let's just say that there was no dearth of fruitcakes in that courtroom.

But we are under siege. And still we do not have one civil right on a federal level, and the radical right industry is raising tens of millions and political capital by making us the ultimate scapegoats.

How many state constitutional amendments need to pass before we get angry? How many of our so-called friends in elected office, and other Democrats, need to betray us by supporting marriage segregation, while in 1987. We believed them.

This march must be built on an entirely different basis: either support full legal equality for LGBT people, including the equal right to marry, or be prepared to catch hell, regardless of your party affiliation.

Too many recent marches, whether for LGBT rights or others, have focused all of their fire on the Republicans, and what has it gotten us? Our friends in the Democratic Party keep moving to the right. The recent filibuster "compromise" meant extremely homophobic judges will be confirmed. That wasn't a compromise. That was a selling out of our community.

Unless we show a strong and united presence before the next presidential election, our community will be once again sacrificed, and we must not remain silent.

The truth is we have nothing to lose, and everything to gain, by marching in the year that the next presidental elections are being held. Besides the many anti-gay Republican politicians, it's time for anti-equality politicians in the Democratic Party to be accountable to our community. Period.

And so, I call on all who believe in full and total civil rights for our community every LGBT organization and person, and all our non-LGBT allies - to put aside all differences, and agree to work together on the 2008 March on Washington.

Robin Tyler initiated the calls for the 1979 and 2000 Marches on Washington. She produced the main stages for the 1979, 1987 and 1993 marches. It is not known whether she will have the same role if a 2008 March is held.

History's largest march was ultimately a failure, leaving lessons for a GLBT march

By Joel Lawson

Veteran activist Robin Tyler's call for a massive LGBT march on Washington in 2008 troubles me.

I respect Tyler. But speaking as someone who was involved in the largest march ever to be set in our nation's capital, the 2004 women's march, I now view such gatherings as impotent.

I was part of the team behind last year's "March for Women's Lives," which brought 1.15 million pro-choice women to the national Mall. The goal was to showcase pro-choice power, especially in an election year. At the end of it all, the only lasting impact was the trampling of grass.

Sure, marchers felt "empowered." But the organizations behind that march - far larger and wealthier than GLBT groups - spent time and energy on the big show that was never matched afterwards at the state and local levels.

After the largest march on Washington in history, the pro-choice movement slithered towards abysmal failure in November. Women went for George Bush. In droves.

Today, even Hillary Clinton is, well, "Clintonizing" how she speaks on the topic of

The lesson: a national march doesn't deliver results unless a much larger effort is aimed afterwards at state and local organizing.

Tyler is dynamic and clever. She understands these risks. But I doubt whether even she could overcome the forces that take hold of big marches - competition among organizations, the egos of leaders and an exhaustion of energies that weakens us on the real battle-

The real target isn't even in Washington these days. George Bush and the Republicancontrolled Congress will remain deaf to us, and the Democrats will barely listen. (Only one senator, a Democrat, spoke in favor of gay marriage from the floor. This senator happened to be from Massachusetts, but he sure wasn't the Massachusetts senator running for

Besides, most marches I've seen in my 17 years inside the beltway have taken place when Congress wasn't in session.

This habit particularly puzzled me when I worked as a congressional aide. If these people, these protesters, really wanted to shake up Congress, why didn't they stay home and confront their representatives at town hall meetings?

The path to gay marriage winds through the states. Statehouse chambers, living rooms and church halls are where perceptions of us must be moved.

I'm glad Robin Tyler is thinking of ways to shake up America. But instead of repeating her history as a national march organizer, I wish she'd keep repeating her more recent work. Robin produced nationwide protests against local TV stations just a few years ago as part of an effort to keep Laura Schlessinger off television.

I co-founded that effort, StopDrLaura.com, and remain in awe of Robin's contribution.

The truth is we have nothing to lose, and everything to gain, by marching in the year that the next presidental elections are being held. Besides the many anti-gay Republican politicians, it's time for anti-equality politicians in the Democratic Party to be accountable to our community. Period.

And so, I call on all who believe in full and total civil rights for our community every LGBT organization and person, and all our non-LGBT allies - to put aside all differences, and agree to work together on the 2008 March on Washington.

Robin Tyler initiated the calls for the 1979 and 2000 Marches on Washington. She produced the main stages for the 1979, 1987 and 1993 marches. It is not known whether she will have the same role if a 2008 March is held.

massive LGBT march on Washington in 2008 troubles me.

I respect Tyler. But speaking as someone who was involved in the largest march ever to be set in our nation's capital, the 2004 women's march, I now view such gatherings as impotent.

I was part of the team behind last year's "March for Women's Lives," which brought 1.15 million pro-choice women to the national Mall. The goal was to showcase pro-choice power, especially in an election year. At the end of it all, the only lasting impact was the trampling of grass.

Sure, marchers felt "empowered." But the organizations behind that march - far larger and wealthier than GLBT groups - spent time and energy on the big show that was never matched afterwards at the state and local levels.

After the largest march on Washington in history, the pro-choice movement slithered towards abysmal failure in November. Women went for George Bush. In droves.

Today, even Hillary Clinton is, well, "Clintonizing" how she speaks on the topic of abortion.

The lesson: a national march doesn't

Veteran activist Robin Tyler's call for a

The real target isn't even in Washington these days. George Bush and the Republicancontrolled Congress will remain deaf to us, and the Democrats will barely listen. (Only one senator, a Democrat, spoke in favor of gay marriage from the floor. This senator happened to be from Massachusetts, but he sure wasn't the Massachusetts senator running for president).

grounds.

Besides, most marches I've seen in my 17 years inside the beltway have taken place when Congress wasn't in session.

This habit particularly puzzled me when I worked as a congressional aide. If these people, these protesters, really wanted to shake up Congress, why didn't they stay home and confront their representatives at town hall meetings?

The path to gay marriage winds through the states. Statehouse chambers, living rooms and church halls are where perceptions of us must be moved.

I'm glad Robin Tyler is thinking of ways to shake up America. But instead of repeating her history as a national march organizer, I wish she'd keep repeating her more recent work. Robin produced nationwide protests against local TV stations just a few years ago as part of an effort to keep Laura Schlessinger off television.

I co-founded that effort, StopDrLaura.com, and remain in awe of Robin's contribution.

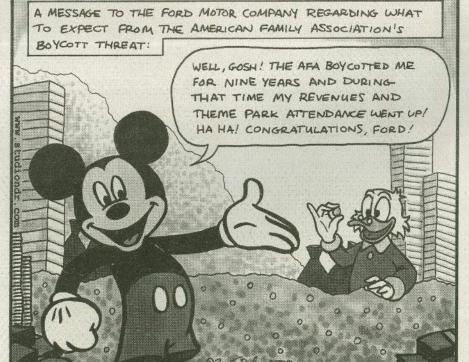

Ignoring the established groups, we built an Internet-grassroots combo, a bunker buster that worked wherever we aimed. She should repeat that success in state capitals nationwide.

Tyler has already leveraged the Internet to mobilize more gay people than you could fit on the national Mall; Rex Wockner has more readers than the largest gay newspaper chain; gay lobbers like John Aravosis are leading mainstream media around by the nose.

As the worldwide Internet is hitting a gay apogee, why are we stuck on a protest model created by Bayard Rustin nearly half a century ago?

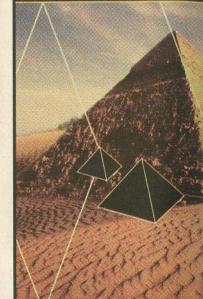

Past marches should be remembered in the museums along the national Mall, but let's get our compatriots to stay - and fight - in the real America that exists far outside the belt-ouston steps up to the big leagues with the 2005 Pride Festival. The daylong event, held in conjunction with the June 25 nighttime Pride Parade, will feature performances by gay punk-rock pioneers Pansy Division and Grammy-nominated singer Sophie B. Hawkins. Also on tap are local acts Christian Andreason and Skyblue72 and a dunking booth featuring several Houston personalities and various nonprofit organizations.

"Since the parade moved to the evening a few years ago, there was no opportunity for a post-parade festival as is offered in many other cities," says Matthew Stone, Pride Festival co-chair. "Pride Houston felt that an extensive festival held before the parade would give the community and the thousands of out-of-town visitors further opportunity to celebrate their Pride, as well as to be entertained and connect with GLBT organizations and businesses."

Hawkins

In addition to having two stages of music, coordinators "have expanded our community market to more than 75 groups and added attractions such as a giant, air-conditioned dance tent," Stone says.

Pansy Division has played its share of Pride festivals, but it hasn't always been an easy road. The San Francisco-bred quartet found that its aggressive, albeit cheery, rock sound didn't always go over too well.

"I remember the first time we played a Gay Pride event," says Jon Ginoli, rhythm guitarist, singer and Pansy manager, on the phone from his home in San Francisco. "That was in Madison, Wis., in '95. I think that the idea of a gay rock band was still just too far out for a lot of people, and we weren't getting invited to too many Pride events," he says.

The guys take the stage at 5:55 p.m. June 25 on the Pride Festival main stage.

"I think at one point you could put on the D.J. and play the dance music, and that would satisfy most people. Over time, people got rather tired of that," Ginoli says. "The diversity of gay people keeps broadening, and the music scene keeps getting more and more diverse. We just thought there should be room for more bands like us and other things that weren't really being heard, not just the same old thump, thump, thump."

Ginoli founded the group in 1991 and was soon joined by bassist Chris Freeman, who was also unhappy with the climate of gay-oriented music. They were soon joined by drummer Luis (no last names, please) and lead guitarist Patrick Goodwin, who was eventually replaced by Bernard Yin.

The group's exposure shot through the roof after a 1994 tour with Green Day, and they released an album every year for six years, trademarking a hard-driving but decidedly gay brand of punk-pop on songs: "Fem in a Black Leather Jacket," "Rachbottomoff," "Touch My Joe Camel" and "Musclehead."

2003's Total Entertainment!, however, looks to be the last new music we'll hear from Pansy Division. The group is split between San Francisco and Los Angeles, and they've only managed occasional concert dates. A three-disc best-of and a DVD are in the works for later this year, and Ginoli has been writing his own music.

Nobody expected it to last this long," he says. "The band began 14 years ago, so it's starting to seem like something that's part of my past life. I feel proud of what we've done, I feel satisfied that we pretty much did achieve what we set out to accomplish. What is different is that we reached more people than I thought we would. I thought we would have very limited appeal."

Singer, songwriter and self-described "omnisexual" Hawkins reached an even bigger audience with her 1992 debut album, Tongues and Tails, which spawned the ubiquitous hit "Damn I Wish I Was Your Lover" and earned her a Grammy nomination for best new artist. The subsequent single, "As I Lay Me Down," was equally inescapable on radio and spent 67 weeks — well more than a year — on the Billboard charts.

But it wasn't all rock-star parties and redcarpet schmoozing, Hawkins says.

"Having big hits isn't having big hits, except in retrospect. You're never successful in the moment. You're at that moment fighting everybody tooth and nail for anything, and that's why they became hits, basically," says Hawkins, en route from weekend gigs in Provincetown to Boston then on to California.

Hawkins performs at 7 p.m. June 25 on the Houston Pride Festival main stage.

Despite those hard-earned hits, label politics stalled the release of follow-up album Timbre. Hawkins opted out of her contract with Sony and eventually released that album via her own Trumpet Swan Records in 2001. It was followed last year by Wilderness, Hawkins's first completely independent album, which features production by the normally dance-floor driven Berman Brothers (Amber, Baha Men, Real McCoy).

Wilderness, however, is awash in a pop-flavored sensuality, anchored by vibrant horn and percussion arrangements. And if there were any justice in this world, tracks "Walking on Thin Ice" and "Angel of Darkness" would earn places alongside Hawkins's pair of radio hits.

Hawkins received some major prime-time exposure on the new NBC show Hit Me Baby One More Time, which showcases past hitmakers performing one of their classics and another tune by a contemporary chart-topper. Audience votes determine the winner, who donates money to the charity of their choice. Previous contestants include mall-queen Tiffany, rapper Vanilla Ice and CeCe Peniston, whose pop tune Finally still fills dance floors.

"In a way, I'm in the same position" as earlier in her career, Hawkins says. "I'm fighting for my work. I'm fighting to keep it out there. I've always been. The difference is, now I'm using my own money. I don't have any middlemen. Now, I'm more who I am. I'm so incredibly responsible for every move that I make, but it is a real career."

And even if she never again scales the heights of pop stardom, Hawkins will probably be OK. She seems fully realized and wholly satisfied — not only as an artist, but as a woman and a human being.

"When my first record came out —
'Damn I Wish I Was Your Lover' — I got so much flak from the gay community that I wasn't gay enough. It really was amazing to me, but I've always gotten that, even before I made a record. I've had my struggles, and I've wanted to be accepted," says Hawkins, who is quick to add that she is in strong support of gay marriage and sees gay adoption as
"very healthy for humanity."

"Now, I just feel like I don't want to be accepted by anyone. I just want to be an individual. I'm so glad that I'm an omnisexual. I'm so glad that I'm an individual. I just don't think it's a big deal anymore. Maybe that's just the point that I'm at in my life."

The Oak Cliff advantage

By Brian Howell

Twenty years ago when I moved to Dallas, the gay and lesbian community had begun to coalesce in Oak Lawn. It was an exciting time in our community and, over the next several years, it was thrilling to see how we developed our own identity and began to have an impact on "our" part of town. Shops, restaurants and clubs began to cater specifically to us. Looking at Oak Lawn today, I am struck by the dramatic difference in our once-shabby little corner of Dallas

About 10 years ago, I made a big decision and left the incubator of Dallas' gay culture, moving south to Oak Cliff. Back then when you told someone you lived down here, you were certain to get one of two responses.

The first was shock. Horror stories broadcast regularly about the crime rate in Oak Cliff left many people with the impression that no one with any common sense — or financial resources — would be caught there.

The second response was to project their ignorance. Many people had no idea where Oak Cliff was located.

In those 10 years, both neighborhoods have made dramatic changes. Oak Lawn has become a much-loved part of Dallas. When you frequent one of the neighborhood's many restaurants, you're as likely to be seated next to a couple from a far-off suburb as you are to be seated next to an Oak Lawn local. It has become "trendy" to play or reside in 75219.

During the same time, things have evolved fairly rapidly in Oak Cliff. Today Oak Cliff is a haven for people who want to be part of a community that embraces diversity, offers great restaurants and attractions but is also an affordable area to establish roots. Most of my favorite haunts are right here in my own backyard. My need to cross the bling and tripling in some cases. Many businesses have taken advantage of the changing populations in this area and have opened new storefronts in our neighborhood.

Today, there are few reasons to move to Oak Cliff. We have grocery stores, home improvement stores and nearly all of the other service-related businesses that you'll find throughout Dallas. The number of restaurants here has gone from just a few to literally dozens. The best part is that many of these are locally owned and have real personality. They reflect the look and feel of Oak Cliff.

The look and feel of Oak Cliff is a bit more diverse than many Dallas neighborhoods. Oak Cliff isn't a gay Mecca, and I truly hope that it never evolves into a gay ghetto. The single best asset Oak Cliff has over other neighborhoods is that while it is a remarkably gay friendly area, it is simultaneously friendly to straight people, families, people of color, and people of varying economic backgrounds.

While Oak Lawn has undeniably become the flashy "sister city" to Oak Cliff, there is a lot to be said for the underlying value and financial stability that can be obtained by purchasing a home here in Oak Cliff. You can still buy a wonderful home for less than $100,000 here.

You will want to make some improvements to the home that you just picked up for less than $100,000, but that's part of the charm of this neighborhood. You will no doubt find yourself on a street with several other gay and lesbian households who have been down this path before you, and would love to offer their enthusiasm (and, if you're lucky, perhaps a little help, too) for your newly acquired project.

Or if you're not the handy type, there are houses that have been fully updated and would require nothing more than your personal touch to make them your

Most of my favorite haunts are right here in my own backyard. My need to cross the Trinity River for social occasions has diminished to the point that Oak Lawn now seems as distant as Carrollton or Addison did when I lived near Cedar Springs Road.

The interesting way these two neighborhoods diverged is in the cost of residing in either of them. Oak Lawn has truly seen a dramatic shift to high-dollar, luxury homes. A few years ago, one would not risk walking through the neighborhoods between Cedar Springs Road and Lemmon Avenue at night. Today, those same streets are lined with $300-to-500-thousand homes.

Here in Oak Cliff, the improvements in our neighborhoods have been a bit more subtle, but no less substantial. Those of us who bought into our neighborhoods have watched our property values rise steadily year after year, doureflect the look and feel of Oak Cliff.

The look and feel of Oak Cliff is a bit more diverse than many Dallas neighborhoods. Oak Cliff isn't a gay Mecca, and I truly hope that it never evolves into a gay ghetto. The single best asset Oak Cliff has over other neighborhoods is that while it is a remarkably gay friendly area, it is simultaneously friendly to straight people, families, people of color, and people of varying economic backgrounds.

While Oak Lawn has undeniably become the flashy "sister city" to Oak Cliff, there is a lot to be said for the underlying value and financial stability that can be obtained by purchasing a home here in Oak Cliff. You can still buy a wonderful home for less than $100,000 here.

You will want to make some improvements to the home that you just picked up for less than $100,000, but that's part of the charm of this neighborhood. You will no doubt find yourself on a street with several other gay and lesbian households who have been down this path before you, and would love to offer their enthusiasm (and, if you're lucky, perhaps a little help, too) for your newly acquired project.

Or if you're not the handy type, there are houses that have been fully updated and would require nothing more than your personal touch to make them your home. While not as inexpensive as a fixer-upper, there are two such properties within a block of my home that are available for less than $140,000.

I invite you to consider Oak Cliff the next time you start looking for a new neighborhood. The values that can be found here really do make this the last affordable neighborhood in Dallas where our community already has such a dramatic presence.

The future of gay Dallas will surely continue to include Oak Lawn, but the real gay community has begun to mature here in Oak Cliff. Come see for yourself.

Sex and the small city

POV's new documentary looks at Lubbock's antiquated sex-ed policies ubbock. Texas, doesn't have a great record when it comes to sex education. The teen pregnancy and gonorrhea rates are among the highest in the nation, and the school district's only official line in terms for teaching students is "abstain from sex entirely."

Shelby Knox, 15, a virginal Southern Baptist from the town, wanted to fix that. Shelby is devout — she even took an abstinence-until-marriage pledge - but she's also a self-described liberal Democrat. She sees no conflict in being both Christian and openminded, and she doesn't think her conservative community should have a problem with that.

But boy, do they.

The Education of Shelby Knox, which inaugurates the 18th season of the PBS documentary series POV, may be the most unusual exploration of topics such as gay rights and sex ed you're likely to see. Shelby admits she's naive - she has never seen an adult male's penis or even a condom — but that naivete serves her well in her quest to educate her fellow students.

She doesn't want to have sex before marriage, but she also has openly gay friends who don't even have the right to marry. And her values notwithstanding, Shelby's a realist: Plenty of teens are having risky intercourse, and there's no benefit in preaching abstinence

The Education of Shelby Knox

before marriage if no one's listening. (On the downside, she says her ideal man is someone who enjoys musical theater - she's in for some real dating disappointments.)

Shelby's a poster child for a tolerant Christian who believes strongly in her faith but also balances it with an abiding devotion to social justice. But she is also conflicted.

Ed Ainsworth, a minister whose only mantra is sexual abstinence, is the documentary's de facto antagonist. "The terms 'Christian' and 'liberal' are like oil and water." he tells Shelby, suggesting that her faith cannot be reconciled with the educational work she does as part of the Lubbock Youth Commission and in looking into forming a gay-straight student alliance.

Here, abstinence is equated with being raised in "the right family" and "in church"; those who are sexually active, the argument goes, are irredeemable sinners. But as with many POV episodes, the facts are presented dispassionately, without overt manipulation.

A variety of points of view are presented and viewers can decide for themselves. Not surprisingly, however, the conservatives come across as narrow-minded bigots. "Most homosexuals die by the age of 40" one clueless Texan declares.

The directors, Rose Rosenblatt and Marion Lipschutz, show how Shelby's actions impact not just the Knox family but the community as a whole, with restraint but compassion. It's yet another stand-out production from POV, and enough to get you excited about the entire season.

Facing reality

Lesbian filmmaker Alice Wu looks at two cultures in Saving Face lice Wu is proof positive that all those oft-heard show business clichés — "Dreams can come true," "Good things come to those who wait," "Try, try again" — really do mean something.

The lesbian filmmaker was living in Seattle, designing software, when she got the idea for a novel about the tense relationship between a closeted Chinese-American doctor and her traditional mother. Soon after, She molded the story into Saving Face, a funny and endearing screenplay about culture clash, ly ostracized by her family and community.

While the specifics of the story aren't biographical, Wu identifies closely with the film's relationships and emotions and thinks anyone can.

"The funny thing is, I don't actually think it's just a gay or just an Asian film. I think it's a surprisingly universal film that happens to have very specific characters. I think, in a way, people connect to your characters because they feel so human and real," Wu says.

Saving Face

Films don't get any more charming than this culture-clash comedy in the vein of The Wedding Banquet or My Big Fat Greek Wedding. Despite their heavy cultural influences, each movie brings universal appeal in the plight of their characters to find their place in their community and the world.

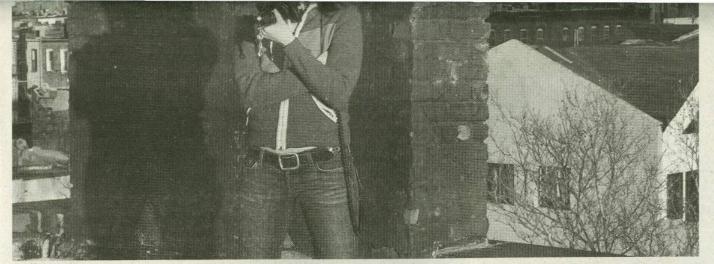

Director Alice Wu creates a delightfully witty, vivid love story about Wil (Michelle Krusiec) and Vivian (Lynn Chen), as well as Wil's challenging relationship with her equally outcast mother (Joan Chen), who becomes pregnant out of wedlock at age 48. Both Wil and her mom face separate issues of shame that they must deal with before reclaiming their lives and happiness.

There are moments that are laugh-out-loud, but more importantly, there are times when you can't pry the smile off your face simply in anticipation of what comes next. Not in a long time has my desire for happily-ever-after been so powerful — and even longer since there's been a movie that deserves its own story-book ending at the box office.

The lesbian filmmaker was living in Seattle, designing software, when she got the idea for a novel about the tense relationship between a closeted Chinese-American doctor and her traditional mother. Soon after, She molded the story into Saving Face, a funny and endearing screenplay about culture clash, identity and unconditional love.

Wu then moved to Brooklyn, gave herself a five-year deadline to get the movie made, worked for free on various film shoots and trained with an editor.

Then, one week after shooting began, Wu realized she had just hit her cut-off date.

"We shot the film in 27 days, and I've never felt more alive," says a clearly excited Wu, speaking by telephone from San Francisco during a break from her promotional tour. "Those were the best days of my working life, ever. It was very worth it."

The film opens Friday at Landmark Theatres in Houston and Dallas.

Saving Face follows Wil (Michelle Krusiec), a successful physician, as she cautiously embarks on a new relationship with gorgeous dancer Vivian (Lynn Chen). At the same time, Wil's widowed mother (Joan Chen) discovers she is pregnant and is quickly ostracized by her family and community.

While the specifics of the story aren't biographical, Wu identifies closely with the film's relationships and emotions and thinks anyone can.

the movie at all. "I care so much about the story," she says. "It's every bit me as an Asian-American lesbian versus me as a filmmaker trying to make this movie."

Part of the film's success lies in its casting. The two romantic leads are charismatic, photogenic performers. But it is legendary actress Chen who surprises in a rare comedic role.

Chen's credits as an actress include The Last Emperor, Heaven and Earth and Twin Peaks, and she directed the critically acclaimed The Sent-Down Girl — sterling work, to be sure, but Wu wasn't convinced that Chen was a perfect fit for her light-hearted film.

"Joan read the script and wanted to meet, but I rejected it at first," Wu says with a laugh. "I thought she was amazing, but she's never done comedy before. There's something overtly sensual, sexual, sexy about her that I didn't see for the mother. I mean, the mother can be beautiful, but she needs to be, like, a mother."

In the end, however, Chen proved suitably convincing as a downtrodden widow, and her subtle work provides many of the film's finest moments.

A legendary actress and a well-received first film — what more could a girl ask for?

"The audiences were all laughing at the same jokes, and that's the thing that I love," Wu says of the movie's warm-hearted reception at screenings.

"Every film that gets made, whether it gets distribution or not, is a small miracle in and of itself. I just want to be able to make films I really care about. If I'm lucky, I will. And if not, then at some point I'll have to find a third career."

Batman Begins

The idea of a conflicted, schizophrenic Batman has been around at least since Frank Miller's graphic novel in the 1980s. But the director of Batman Begins, Christopher Nolan, had done what no other recent films in the franchise have: Put Batman front and center, not peripheral to the villains.

Nolan adapts a whiz-bang comic to a postmodern era, taking his time telling the story of how billionaire playboy Bruce Wayne (a ripped Christian Bale, his biceps the size of cocker spaniels) goes from orphan to avenging angel with the help of a mysterious mentor (Liam Neeson), who teaches him the ways of the Ninja.

The technical aspects are deft, especially the sound and cinematography (although the editing gets a bit frantic in some of the bigger action sequences). But what really works is how Gotham exists in a world apart from our own. This is probably the Batman movie Tim Burton wishes he'd made: Brooding, contemplative, paced like a novel.

All too often we get these CD compilations that come out with long extended remixes on them that, unless you are a total clubhead, might not be for you. I've gone off many times about labels that spend so much money for remixes and never make them commercially available.

Well, this is a gem. It's a smart compilation comprised exclusively of hit mixes by multi-platinum artists, including seven versions of these records never released commercially.

But it also serves up a clever dose of hits from the past, like Deborah Cox's "Nobody's Supposed To Be Here," Toni Braxton's "Unbreak My Heart" and Mariah's "Dreamlover."

While the CD is not beat-mixed, the songs are sequenced with no breaks, making it perfect for throwing on at any social gathering. I know it's gonna be on the top of my play stack. There are 19 songs in all — more than enough to get bang for your buck.

There are some really hot dance singles out at the moment. The new Georgie Porgie truly carries on. It's called "Sunshine" and offers a heaping dose of soulful Chicago house. George always comes through in a grand way, but this single is one of the strongest from him yet.

When it comes to remixes, there's no better combination in my book than teaming Mariah Carey with David Morales. If you like the album version of "It's Like That," just wait until you hear the dance mix. It's hot and steamy, but not too over the top—just what's needed to get you to the dance floor to do a bit of jerking and sweating.

Hands are duly raised for Matchbox20 frontman Rob Thomas's solo project, too. And thank the stars above for the Francois K. remix of "Lonely No More." K. opts for a disco-esque styling filled with heavenly strings and glorious countermelodies.

Disgustingly offensive dirt; garbage; anything grossly indecent or obscene

What's up with Tom Cruise? Plus, a theater wrap-up think Tom Cruise is going nuts. I watch Cruise in interviews and at events, and I see frightened desperation. There used to be a hunger in his eyes when it came to his work. Now there seems to be a hunger when it comes to his public image — as if he's trying so hard to convince us that he's happy, that he's in love, that he's on top of the world.

Which makes me wonder if he's any of those things.

Isn't it intriguing that since the end of his marriage to Nicole Kidman, Cruise seems to have floundered, while Nic has blossomed? She maintains a bemused silence about her famous ex, and the two seem to publicly avoid each other like the plague.

It makes me ask whether they ever spent much time in the same room — to say nothing of anything more intimate.

You may not have guessed from that Cruise material, but this is Billy's all-theater column. Tom, by the way, made some catty comments about Chicago star BrookeShields. Speaking of, a special three-DVD edition of the Oscar-winning film will be released in September.

I recently spoke to producer Craig Zadan, who was quite excited about this

DVD: "You know the musical numbers that switch between reality and fantasy sequences? Now you'll get to see them all the way through."

Also included is "Class" (the deleted duet for Catherine Zeta-Jones and Queen Latifah), behind-the-scenes footage, a couple of documentaries, commentary tracks and something with Chita Rivera. All for less than 35 bucks!

Madonna has tackled many things, but she's never done a musical in front of a live audience — yet. The Hebraic scholar has her eye on a return to the London stage in a vehicle that will require her to utilize her many talents: "My last play sold out within hours. I never missed a performance and, above all, I loved it so much. I'm planning on hooking up again with a musical mentor who I admire so much. And yes, it will be a musical role on the stage," she says. I'm predicting a Madonna-Sir Andy reunion.

I can now reveal that the blind item in an April installment of Filth was about Cherry Jones and Sarah Paulson. At the time, not only was the couple not "out" together, Miss Paulson wasn't at all. Although many people in the theater community knew of this pairing (the ladies met during the filming of Swimmers), both Cherry and Sarah turned down requests to go on the record.

But the mystery ended when the galpals kissed on national television when Cherry won her Tony. To make the matter clear, Jones used her acceptance speech to thank her paramour (cryptically referring to Sarah as Laura Wingfield, her character in The Glass Menagerie). This was only one of the queer moments, which included sexy JerryMitchell's liplock with lover Erik Sherr.

You'd think the folks at La Cage aux Folles would be celebrating the wins for best revival of a musical and best choreography. Alas, there has been nary a blip at the box break-up, I do know that Richie is now involved with producer Jordan Roth. Allegedly, everyone gets along, and little Jackson will someday have a helluva story to tell his therapist.

Mark in Ft. Lauderdale asks: "I've been a member of Filth2Go.com ever since you posted photos of Steven Weber's big ole shlong from Hair. It looks like those were stills from a videotape. Since you now post videos on your Web site, is there any chance you'll share the goods?"

There's a very good chance. Steven Weber and Sam Harris appeared in a semi-staged production of Hair in L.A. in 2001. Since I knew this production would include the infamous nude scene at the end of the Act 1, I was prepared.

I wasn't prepared, though, for the sight of Steven's incredibly large cock. It would be unseemly for me to imply that different people took turns "assisting" with the appearance of this appendage, but it wouldn't be an incorrect allegation, either. In a Filth2Go exclusive, we now provide you with the uncut footage of the infamous Weber weenie! Enjoy.

This is a complicated story. While both B.D. and Richie Jackson adopted the child, the offspring, Jackson Wong, was the result of Richie's sister's egg and B.D.'s sperm!
